Server 2008.

The application is used to maintain an inventory database and is accessed from several remote Windows client applications. The application frequently updates multiple rows in a database table by using a DbDataAdapter object.

You need to resolve the performance issue.

What should you do?

A. Disable batch updates. Modify the client application to perform a single update.

B. Insert a random time interval between updates.

C. Move the update method calls to a separate BackgroundWorker thread.

D. Remove any limit on batch update sizes. Modify the client application to perform a single update.

Answer: D

Explanation:

Requirements Several remote Windows client applications. The application frequently updates multiple rows in a database table by using a DbDataAdapter object. (The DbDataAdapter class inherits from the DataAdapter class and helps a class implement a DataAdapter designed for use with a relational database. An application does not create an instance of the DbDataAdapter interface directly, but creates an instance of a class that inherits IDbDataAdapter and DbDataAdapter.) The BackgroundWorker component is designed to allow you to execute time-consuming operations on a separate, dedicated thread. This allows you to run operations that take a lot of time, such as file downloads and database transactions asynchronously and allow the UI to remain responsive.
