NEW QUESTION: 1

You notice that there is a very high percentage of wait time for RAC database that has frequent insert operations.

Which two recommendations may reduce this problem?

- A. using reverse key indexes
- B. uniform and large extent sizes
- C. smaller extent sizes
- D. shorter transactions
- E. automatic segment space management
- F. increasing sequence cache sizes

Answer: B,E

Explanation:

Segments have High Water Mark (HWM) indicating that blocks below that HWM have been formatted. New tables or truncated tables [that is truncated without reuse storage clause], have HWM value set to segment header block. Meaning, there are zero blocks below HWM. As new rows inserted or existing rows updated (increasing row length), more blocks are added to the free lists and HWM bumped up to reflect these new blocks. HW enqueues are acquired in Exclusive mode before updating HWM and essentially HW enqueues operate as a serializing mechanism for HWM updates. Allocating additional extent with instance keyword seems to help in non-ASSM tablespace serialization of data blocks in the buffer cache due to lack of free lists, free list groups, transaction slots (INITRANS), or shortage of rollback segments. This is particularly common on INSERT-heavy applications, in applications that have raised the block size above 8K, or in applications with large numbers of active users and few rollback segments. Use automatic segment-space management (ASSM) and automatic undo management to solve this problem. HW enqueue The HW enqueue is used to serialize the allocation of space beyond the high water mark of a segment. If this is a point of contention for an object, then manual allocation of extents solves the problem.
