NEW QUESTION: 1

A customer has an existing SAN environment. The customer wants to add NAS to share the storage space. Which solution is most appropriate?

- A. Scale-out NAS
- B. IP SAN
- C. FCoE SAN
- D. Gateway NAS

Answer: D

Explanation:

NAS Implementation - Gateway NAS A gateway NAS device consists of one or more NAS heads and uses external and independently managed storage. Similar to unified NAS, the storage is shared with other applications that uses block-level I/O. Management functions in this type of solution are more complex than those in a unified NAS environment because there are separate administrative tasks for the NAS head and the storage. A gateway solution can use the FC infrastructure, such as switches and directors for accessing SAN-attached storage arrays or direct-attached storage arrays.

The gateway NAS is more scalable compared to unified NAS because NAS heads and storage arrays can be independently scaled up when required. For example, NAS heads can be added to scale up the NAS device performance. When the storage limit is reached, it can scale up, adding capacity on the SAN, independent of NAS heads. Similar to a unified NAS, a gateway NAS also enables high utilization of storage capacity by sharing it with the SAN environment. EMC E10-001 Student Resource Guide.
