NEW QUESTION: 2
A technician wants to move memory from a few older systems. What is the most efficient method to accomplish this task?
A. Power down any of the older servers to move any memory lo the new server Update BIOS to allow mismatched memory
B. Use iDRAC to view the memory details of the older systems
Power down the servers to move matching memory to the new server
C. Power down all the older servers to physically check the memory
Move any matching memory to the new server
D. Back up the server profile on the older server
Hove the matching memory and import the server profile to the new server
Answer: A

NEW QUESTION: 3
You are designing a routed access layer for a high availability campus network that will be deployed using only Cisco devices.
Which of the following are most likely to result in fast and deterministic recovery when a path to a destination becomes invalid? (Choose two.)
A. a single path to the destination
B. redundant equal-cost paths to the destination
C. redundant unequal-cost paths to the destination
D. RIP

E. EIGRP
F. OSPF
Answer: B,E
Explanation:
Explanation/Reference:
Section: Addressing and Routing Protocols in an Existing Network Explanation Explanation:
Of the available choices, Enhanced Interior Gateway Routing Protocol (EIGRP) and redundant equal-cost paths to the destination are most likely to result in fast and deterministic recovery when a path to a destination becomes invalid. Both Open Shortest Path First (OSPF) and the Cisco-developed EIGRP are dynamic routing protocols and are capable of fast convergence. However, on a network that contains only Cisco routers, EIGRP is typically simpler to deploy than OSPF and can converge faster than OSPF because of the feasible successors stored in the EIGRP topology database.
One means of optimizing a routing design is to create redundant equal-cost paths between devices because such a design promotes fast and deterministic recovery when a path becomes invalid. When either EIGRP or OSPF has a redundant equal-cost path to a destination, all of the new path calculation occurs on the local device if one of the paths becomes unavailable. If the device has no redundant equal- cost paths, the routing protocol must rely on information from neighboring devices and calculate a new path.
Routing Information Protocol (RIP) does not offer fast recovery. RIP sends out routing updates every 30 seconds, so convergence is relatively slow. In addition, RIP relies on hold-down timers, which further slowdown convergence time.
The amount of time required for a routing protocol to detect the loss of a forwarding path and to calculate a new best path can both affect convergence time. In addition, the amount of time it takes for the Cisco Express Forwarding (CEF) table to populate with routing updates can affect the speed of convergence. It is therefore important when designing a network to ensure that the routing design is an optimized design.
