NEW QUESTION: 2

Which of the following would MOST effectively enhance the security of a challenge-response based authentication system?

- A. implementing measures to prevent session hijacking attacks
- B. Selecting a more robust algorithm to generate challenge strings
- C. increasing the frequency of associated password changes
- D. increasing the length of authentication strings

Answer: A

Explanation:

Explanation/Reference:

Explanation:

Challenge response-based authentication is prone to session hijacking or man-in-the-middle attacks.

Security management should be aware of this and engage in risk assessment and control design when they employ this technology. Selecting a more robust algorithm will enhance the security; however, this may not be as important in terms of risk when compared to man-in-the-middle attacks. Choices C and D are good security practices; however, they are not as effective a preventive measure. Frequently changing passwords is a good security practice; however, the exposures lurking in communication pathways may pose a greater risk.

NEW QUESTION: 3

Pervasive Computing and Mobile Computing Devices have to sacrifice certain functions. Which statement concerning those devices is false.

- A. These devices share common security concerns with other resource-constrained devices.
- B. In many cases, security services have been sacrificed to provide richer user interaction when processing power is very limited.
- C. In many cases, security services has been enhanced due to the lack of services available.
- D. Their mobility has made them a prime vector for data loss since they can be used to transmit and store information in ways that may be difficult to control.

Answer: C

Explanation:

This is a detailed oriented question to test if you are paying attention to both the question and answer. While the answer sounds legitimate, it is not truly the case in these types of devices. Just remember, even if you have one service running, that does not mean you are secure if the service itself has not been secured.

From the official guide:

"The number of small mobile devices has grown considerably in the past four or five years. Products vary from sophisticated mobile phones, such as third-generation (3G) handsets, to full-featured "netbooks" and personal digital assistants (PDAs).

These devices share common security concerns with other resource-constrained devices. In many cases, security services have been sacrificed to provide richer user interaction when processing power is very limited. Also, their mobility has made them a prime vector for data loss since they can be used to transmit and store information in ways that may be difficult to control."

The following answers are incorrect:

- These devices share common security concerns with other resource-constrained devices.
- In many cases, security services have been sacrificed to provide richer user interaction when processing power is very limited.
- Their mobility has made them a prime vector for data loss since they can be used to transmit and store information in ways that may be difficult to control.
