NEW QUESTION: 2

Ten members of the Research staff in a small company have individual dial-up connections to the Internet. This is costing the company a lot of money. Which server type would provide the BEST solution to reduce the cost of internet access, and at the same time allow the company to better manage their wide area connections?

- A. An HTTP server which downloads and mirrors the previous day page requests from the Research Department
- B. A database server, using an off-line dial-up connection, which caches and sorts the pages required by the Research Department
- C. A company-wide proxy server with a single high-speed internet connection, providing internet access to all staff in the Research Department.
- D. A centralized file server with a single, high-speed internet connection, managed by a member of the IT team who downloads the pages required by the Research Department.

Answer: C

NEW QUESTION: 3

A web company is looking to implement an intrusion detection and prevention system into their deployed VPC. This platform should have the ability to scale to thousands of instances running inside of the VPC, How should they architect their solution to achieve these goals?

A. Configure each host with an agent that collects all network traffic and sends that traffic to the IDS/IPS platform for inspection.

B. Create a second VPC and route all traffic from the primary application VPC through the second VPC where the scalable virtualized IDS/IPS platform resides.

C. Configure servers running in the VPC using the host-based 'route' commands to send all traffic through the platform to a scalable virtualized IDS/IPS.

D. Configure an instance with monitoring software and the elastic network interface (ENI) set to promiscuous mode packet sniffing to see an traffic across the VPC,

Answer: A

Explanation:

Explanation

A. Not possible to set an instance's NIC into promiscuous mode.

B. Incorrect... VPC peering connections are not "transitive", i.e. you cannot pass traffic through a VPC peering connection into another VPC, and then have that other VPC send the traffic to some third VPC, or the Internet, or a VPN, or a direct connect circuit. (I would assume AWS does not allow redistribution of routes from one VPC's back-end VRF into another VPC's back-end VRF, unless it is that first VPC's CIDR block?

Someone from AWS would have to chime in here, and they're probably not going to tell us.)

C. This one is incorrect because adding static routes on an instance won't affect the routing from any point after the packet leaves the instance's NIC. AWS will check the destination IP address in the packet header and forward according to the VPC routing table's routes. You'd need to make routing changes in the VPC route table for that instance's traffic to get sent through another device (e.g. NAT gateway, VPN instance, or security proxy in this case). (You could tunnel/proxy the traffic over through the IPS tier by changing the destination IP address in the IP header of the packet before it left the instance. But choice C did not state anything about doing anything like that. It just said add a static route on the instance, which does not change the destination IP address in the IP header of the packet.)

D. Correct, this is the standard approach, and is definitely scalable.
