Your EC2-Based Multi-tier application includes a monitoring instance that periodically makes application

-level read only requests of various application components and if any of those fail more than three times

30 seconds calls CloudWatch to fire an alarm, and the alarm notifies your operations team by email and SMS of a possible application health problem. However, you also need to watch the watcher -the monitoring instance itself - and be notified if it becomes unhealthy.

Which of the following is a simple way to achieve that goal?

A. Have the monitoring instances post messages to an SOS queue and then dequeue those messages on another instance should the queue cease to have new messages, the second instance should first notify your operations team if the CPU usage exceeds 50% for more than one minute: then have your monitoring application go into a CPU-bound loop should it detect any application problems.

C. Run another monitoring instance that pings the monitoring instance and fires a Cloud Watch alarm that notifies your operations team should the primary monitoring instance become unhealthy.
