Which of the following Common Data Network Services allocates computing power resources among workstations with some shared resources centralized on a server?

- A. Print services
- B. File services
- C. Client/Server services
- D. Domain Name Service
- B. Print services.
- C. Mail services.
- D. Domain Name Service.
- E. Client/Server services.

Answer: B

Explanation:

Client/Server services allocate computing power resources among workstations with some shared resources centralized in servers. For example, if you are using a product that is working in a client/ server model, in reality you have a small piece of the product on your computer (client portion) and the larger piece of the software product is running on a different computer (server portion). The communication between these two pieces of the same software product needs to be controlled, which is why session layer protocols even exist. Session layer protocols take on the functionality of middleware, which allows software on two different computers to communicate. Distributed systems are the opposite of centralized systems like mainframes and thin client implementations. Traditional client/server architectures are the most common example of a distributed system. In a traditional client/server architecture, responsibilities for processing have been balanced between centralized servers providing services to multiple clients and client machines that focus on user interaction and standalone processing where appropriate. For the most part, servers are responsible for serving, meaning that they provide services that will be leveraged by the clients in the environment. Clients are the primary consumers of server services, while also hosting services of their own primarily for their own individual use.
