NEW QUESTION: 1

Your customer wants to update the new office address in about 1000 answer articles. Your client has three interfaces for each of their lines of business that will all have different information.

What will you recommend to the client to update all the relevant answers?

- A. Search for all answers that have the address and update.
- B. Create a standard text to include the new address and update all the answers to include it.
- C. Create a variable to contain the address and update all answers to include it.
- D. Call support and have them run a search and replace on the database.

Answer: A

Explanation:

Explanation

Answer variables are predefined shortcuts for entering information into an answer instead of a long string of text. When an answer displays on the customer portal, the variable is replaced with whatever value was specified by your administrator.

Variables are also helpful to use for information that may change. When your administrator changes the value of the variable, all answers containing that variable will also change. Contact your administrator for a list of variables defined for your application. For example, if your administrator added a variable for a support email address at your organization called "contact," you could insert the variable for the email address in the answer, such as $contact. If the email address changes, all answers containing the contact variable are updated.
