The chief audit executive is attempting to standardize the engagement procedures used throughout the organization. Many of the internal auditors are employed at distant locations. The CAE wants to select a process that will encourage input from a cross section of internal auditors, facilitate differing perspectives, and encourage acceptance of changes that might result from the standardization. The decision-making process that will most effectively achieve the CAE's goals is

- A. The contingency approach.
- B. A decision-making model.
- C. Programmed decision making.
- D. Group-aided decision making.

Answer: D

Explanation:

The advantages of group decision making are that the group will have broader experience, greater expertise, a wider range of perspectives, and a greater capacity for absorbing facts than an individual. The exchange of viewpoints within the group may provide more illumination of the problem than could be achieved by one person. Group-aided decision making facilitates analyzing problems and estimating needed actions. It encourages participation and acceptance of decisions.
